Plan Your Autism Emergency For Families, Educators and Service Providers

What happens if you are driving your loved one to a therapy session and you are rendered unconscious in an automobile accident? What happens if you are conducting a therapy session and a fire breaks out? Few of us have contemplated these possibilities. While they are important for any family, they are critical for families living with autism and the professionals who help them. Emergency Personnel arriving on scene don't automatically know that your loved one has autism. How do you safely communicate that information? In short, how do you help First Responders help you, and your loved one with autism, in an emergency? Join us to learn how.

The presenter, Brian Herritt, is a Consultant for Autism Risk and Safety Management and a police officer with a Southern California agency. Officer Herritt is also the father of a non-verbal child with Autism.
